3. Production Kits

The Production Kit organizational system used in this and numerous other Zero-G cinematic titles is somewhat unique in the world of sampling, and aids the user gain insight into the intended contexts of the provided sound materials. This, of course, is not to forbid the user to straying; indeed, we'd highly encourage the user to experiment! However, by presenting the sounds within short, musical and sound design 'cues', we hope to inspire the user's imagination and aid him / her in quickly and effectively achieving his / her creative goals.

Stylistically speaking, the Production Kits are somewhat diverse, yet retain a degree of cohesion through the common approach to sound development and organization. Kits Abstract 1 to 4 draw considerable influence from the 'acousmatic' works of contemporary electro-acoustic musicians such as Ake Parmerud. Somewhat different in style are the hard-hitting High Impact kits, which incorporate a range of powerful, trailer-style impacts and gestures. As always, mixing and matching the sounds in the various Production Kits tends to yields interesting fusions that the user may well enjoy exploring.

4. Production Elements

The Production Elements section of the library provides an extensive collection of single-hit sound files, covering a broad range of styles and applications. Sets such as Barbed Wire and Horror Stingers blend elements of 20th century sonorism with contemporary film score. Such sets have clear applications in cinematic music. The sub-section SFX is comprised of a variety of futuristic FX sounds that may be useful in sound design projects. Other sets, such as Trailer Whooshes and Cinematic Risers, were created particularly with film and video game trailers in mind, although they may be equally appropriate for use in electronic dance music. However, while much of the content in this section was created with certain applications in mind, the user should feel free to mix, match, process and re-combine sounds to generate new and unique sonic creations.
